Title: Around intentionally

Abstract: The adverb intentionally is clearly semantically (not to mention morphologically) related to the adjective intentional, the verb intend, and the noun intention, but how are they related? I will begin by surveying some of the ways that intentionally has been treated over the years only to find out that the question of how intentionally is semantically related to these other members of the family still seems to be open. One of the difficulties that arises is that whereas intentionally is present-directed in the sense of being directed at the action being carried out, "intend" is future-directed. For example, in (1) Rebeka intentionally traveled to Düsseldorf, her traveling to Düsseldorf was intentional of her, but in (2) Rebeka intended to travel to Düsseldorf, it may turn out that she never traveled to Düsseldorf in the end. In this respect, (3) Rebeka's intention to travel to Düsseldorf appears to be more closely related to (1) than to (2). I will sketch a proposal about how to semantically relate intentionally and its kin in an event semantic framework.
